Hearing the Call to Live to Our Fullest Capacity

As we begin the season of Ordinary Time, today's readings invite us to refocus, to take stock of what we most desire and how we are going after it....

[In today's Epistle,] Paul goes back to his holistic Hebrew roots and proclaims that the human person is a unity, an integrated whole who lives and grows and 'becomes' in the context of biology, history and the love of God.... Paul lived in a time when Greek philosophy [including Gnosticism] specialized in... separating body and soul...; [and] denigrated the physical, judging it either evil or irrelevant. [On the contrary, Paul says, our]... very bodies are temples – the flesh-and-blood abode of God's own spirit.... The body is for the Lord and the Lord for the body.... We are social beings who don't invent ourselves. Everything we do relates us to others, and ultimately to God.... And he wants us to rejoice in that and live it to our fullest capacity.

In these days when fewer and fewer people seem to be hearing a call to religious life or priesthood, or even participation in church life, the story of Eli and Samuel [in the First Reading] invites us to think about our religious expectations and how we listen. Have we, like the people of [Samuel's] days, become convinced that God is not calling? Are we simply going along with the idea that being "spiritual" is replacing being "religious," that each person figures out their own relationship with God without communal ties or expression? That popular concept seems to go quite well with "[North] American individualism," but lacks something from the tradition of the God of Israel and Jesus. This reading seems to invite us... to wake up and risk believing that God is calling us; ...to say, "Speak, Lord, I am listening."
