We're Not the Same People...

The first-century "orthodox" Christian belief is perfectly summarized when the risen Jesus insists that Mary [Magdalen] "stop holding" on to him. After the Resurrection, we're dealing with [a] "new creation," a phenomenon that can't be isolated to one place or time, or limited to one particular manifestation. The risen Jesus appears how and when He wishes, to people and in situations He chooses, far beyond just the Eucharistic bread and wine. Mary tries to hang on to someone who has been transformed.[...]

The [...] Letter to the Colossians lays out the basics of such an encounter. As Paul constantly taught, one must first die with Jesus before rising with Jesus. They are two sides of the same action. Once we start to imitate Jesus' death by generously giving ourselves to others, our lives start to evolve on a different level. We begin to see things we never before noticed, to espouse values we never dreamt of before. Paul frequently referred to this turnabout as our becoming a "new creation." We're no longer the same people we were before we died and rose with Jesus. [...] Everything changes [...]. Among other things, we start to act [differently].

[The Gospels...] portray Jesus' first followers as simple, uneducated working-class Jews, many of them fishermen; people who, like Peter, wouldn't hesitate to deny they even know this Galilean carpenter when push came to shove. Yet something obviously happened to change them. According to Acts, they're no longer afraid to identify with Jesus, the enemy of the state and tormentor of organized religion [of the day]. They not only preach him openly, they invite others to share their commitment. [...] They're not the same people they were before Easter Sunday.

Their only explanation for this drastic turnabout revolves around having experiences of their presumed-dead leader, now alive and active in their midst.
