One Take On Christian Art

JAMES B JANKNEGT, the artist featured in today's bulletin, who converted to Catholicism in 2005-07, lives on an "art farm" he created in Texas. He writes:

In the past decade I have found myself devoted to re-establishing painting that can be called Christian in the great tradition of the Church before the reformation and the outburst of iconoclasm changed the world of art forever. I am not, however, trying to paint in the style of the great Christian painters of the past, merely attempting to paint in the same spirit. Below is a beautiful quote that helps define what "Christian Art" is:

“Art is sacred if it is above all beautiful, that is, intrinsically splendid, because it is fully intelligible, so that it makes first the artist and then the person who enjoys it want to cross over into infinity. This art is religious if it produces a longing for the divine, namely, if it leads one to transcend one's own self in order to meet God and with him one's neighbour. This art is Christian if, through the adventures of the spirit, it recounts what happened between God and man in the history of salvation, if it rises to God like a sweet and profound prayer, if it makes “God's glory” visible, though in a hidden manner, in the celebration of the divine mysteries.”
